“ I met Chris a few years ago, and he brought an absolute light with him that always made me look forward to seeing him. He had a special talent for creating a sense of community and making everyone feel included. A deep thinker, Chris cared deeply about uplifting those around him and sharing his joy with everyone he met.

Chris was a great friend; he never judged. He was kind, humble, talented and wise. He was pursuing a life he loved, full of amazing memories that most people only dream about. Chris showed many of us how to live a great life, grounded in community and always welcoming someone new.

When we moved into our first home, Chris showed up with a grill he had found on Facebook in his van. Four years later, we are still using that grill. One of the first times I hung out with Chris he invited us over and crafted an amazing vegan dinner. He didn't make it weird that I have a peculiar diet; instead, he embraced it and made me feel welcome. Something about that sticks with me - the kindness to go with the flow and making people feel comfortable around him. Fun fact, he is a great cook!

Chris was one of those special people who opened doors to a world of possibilities that only truly talented people can. He had a rare gift for making the impossible a reality for many. He brought immense joy and new experiences to everyone. He did everything he could to include you in these incredible adventures that many only dream of doing. Chris had a knack for expressing deep feelings and made you feel welcome in owning and feeling your own.

From Chris, I learned the importance of immersing yourself in the things you love, no matter how unconventional the path may be. He was a shining example of living authentically, and he left this world as a net positive. Not many people can say that.

Accepting this reality is hard, but I am incredibly grateful to call

Chris a friend.
